In the Adriatic Sea, near the island of Lists, the Austrian Float under Admiral Tegethoff and the Italian, under command of Admiral Persano, -both able commanders, -- are fighting together. All the late im-provements in war vessels, of the latest invention, were, on both sides, nearly equally divided; the battle as a test of modern warfare at eea. The weather is slormy, with a heavy sea caused by the northern gales; es atmosphere thick with the smoke of the thundering iconolads in furious molde. All at once, the Ferdinand-Mas (the Anstrian flagship) and the Rd d'Italia, both ironelad vessels, meet each other. The captain of the Ferdinand-Man, discerning the gray colour of the enemy's vessel, position for being rummed, orders the bold managure, and, with courageous self-reliance, runs right on to-wards the enemy's broadelde. The Rs d'Italia tried to escape, by steaming backwards, but too late she saw the danger, in consequence of the thick clouds of smoke around her. The Ferdinand-Man put on ful speed, and, with the momentum of its whole weight and a speed of eleven miles, ran its steel spur right into the flank of its enemy. The collision of the huge masses caused a most terrible crash to be heard. The shock was so violent, that the Ré d'Italia fell entirely on beam-ends, while the Fordinand-Man was raised over her, by the sea, smashing the iron plates, ribs and beams of the unfortunate vessel. The Ferdinand-Mas quickly backing, immediately after the collision -(which is strictly necessary for the ramming vessel, to prevent her being locked and drawn down with her be) drew back, and the Ré d'Halia, totally broken up, with a breach of 62 squero feet-(as was ascorteined inter, by the mark left on the painted spur and stern of the Fordinand-Max, where the hard fristion had nearly polished the iron) - turned over again; the water streaming through the breach; the crew strug-gling through the hatches and port-boles and elinging to the masts and rigging. Thus, while the Ferdinand-Mas was slowly drawing backwards, the Réd'lialia was fast sinking;—and, speedily and surely, the work of destruction was accomplished.

The Austrian officers contemplated with horror their work, while the Réd'Italia was sinking in the deep, smidst the agonized cry for help of its crew. The firing had ceased and all eyes were fixed on the water, which was ingulfing the once proud and powerful sea-castle and its inmates. For a moment all was silent; at this time the ship had sunk entirely; the water closing over her, while thousands of whichpools carried down, for an instant, all, the living and the HMS Rambler Commander the Hon. Follow dend. Then, all of a sudden, while every eye was strained towards the place where the Rod Ralia had disappeared, the surface of the sea was covered with human beings, given up again from the deep; on the point of being drowned, and struggling for life with the stormy element. Now no time was to be lost in saving what could yet be saved. Admiral Tegethoff ordered his vessal to be stopped and the boats to be put out, and the Eliezbeth, an Austrian paddle-wheel tender, hastened to the spot, to give assistance. But, what horror! Furious for revenge, the Italians had came up, on both sides, to attack the Ferdinand Man, -Humanity had to give place to self-preservation; and, the Ferdinand-Mas, being itself somewhat damaged by the action of ramming, had just time enough
